old farm-hous

This is the old farm-house
With its deep, rose-inngled porch,
Where hover and the white butterdies,
And heese-beep bold debacet.
The heese beep hold debacet.
The heese heese hold debacet.
The dear familiar croft,
In lac dear familiar croft,
In lac dear familiar croft,
In lac dear familiar croft,
And my heart, my heart files back
On the dead years, shadowy track,
And now in the lane on a loaded wain,
Im a happy and hol little hoy ag in?

Just such a windless moon
As this, in a buried June,
When the scented hay in the meadows lay,
And the thrushes were all in tune,
On the susgering load i, exultant rode,
And the red-faced wagener "wey'd" and
""goa"d.
Long and in a buried June;

Days when to breathe was bliss, Feriect, and pure, and strong: No pulse of the heart amiss, No beat of the brainwork wrong: When bare was a word, and love an abs Fabrication of story and song.

is it so long ago,
This life of color and light?
Will it not how some siter-glow
Whe the day dipeinto the night?
Dyoath; have you left me quite?
U years, have you dimmed my sight?
Lo! the light is shade, and the color
And the day dips into the night.

A GRECIAN BEND TRAGEDY.

At midnight in her chamber ione, White round her form, the lamp-light short A maiden fant did sadly mean; She was a girl of inghity grit. Her breas was heaving wild with peasion the was so mid aine could have "fit," Because she couldn't oatch the lashlon. I'll do it, sure," the maiden said, The while with wrath she shook her head, And that shore! sleep in oed; 'an bound to have the proper bend; 'an bound to have the proper bend; No mure l'il beat the idle storaing Of other girls whom Heaven mend— Or orreak their acks the dist line morning

But here she ceased, and with a sigh, as though she fain would stop and cry, lesfore the glass with courage high. This fied the night before the morn, it of lovely form are aguirmed and twisted but with the dawn and "owned the cold," And from her effort wall desired. Then goaded on by wounded pride, Nor knowing where her shame to hide, Nor knowing where her shame to hide, I have now in the same of the hough it surely seems too bad. Her sorrow should be never ending, Her spectraf form, a yision sad.—At mindight still is Greelan bond-ing.

There are some virtues, the odiward expression of which can, with tolerable correctness, be counterfeited by those who do not possess them; and a feeling of suspidon and distrust is often naturally awakesed as the genuineness of the principle, even when there is an external manifestation of it. Kindness and benevolence find their natural exexpression not only in generous deeds and self-sacrificing efforts, but in lesser acts of kindness; in looks, tones and gestures of civility, deference and contecusness, which are so winning and pleasing that it is no wonder they are frequently counterfested. There are not wanting those who, sactasted by selfish molives, and seeing the admiration and affection yielded to a kindly and courteous bearing, endeavor to produce the fruit, without cultivating the root. Such efforts are often attended with such a degree of success, until some real sacrifice is required, when the selfish nature that has been hidden under a faise exterior is brought to light, and the politicess is found to be the selfish nature that has been hidden under a false exterior is brought to light, and the pollteness is found to be artificial and soulless. Such discoveriss lead amay excellent persons to undervalue and depreciate courteousness. We often hear the remark, 'it is no matter about the manners so long as the heart is right;' and we not unfrequently see the truly generous man repressing the natural outflow of his emotions, and performing benevolent actions in the most ungracious manner. Such persons make a serious and fatal mistake; one which, if persisted in, will immeasurably lessen the good they can impart, and the happiness they can receive.

The pleasure conferred on others by kind and courteous manners is not can impart, and the happiness they can receive.

The pleasure conferred on others by kind and courteous manners is not measured by the value of the benefit iself, but by the grateful sensation of being the object of kindness and cordislity. The civility in itself may bring no paipable advantage, may require no material sacriface, may involve neither lose nor trouble, and may be only respectful sitention or a kindly inquiry, or an effort to relieve embarrasment, yet it may conduce more to the happiness of him who receives it, than the most expensive charity. The money of the generous will relieve distress and incite gratitude, but he who brings the graspof cordisity, the smile of sympathy, the delicate and kindly attention, throws a sunshine into the heart that no material benefit can convey. Though few have it in their power togive money largely, all can bestow courtesy without reserve, and it will increase by its liberal diffusion.

Courteous manners not only convey happiness in large measure (1) for each of the courte of the remaining the reserved to the paper in large measure (1) the re-courtesy without reserve, and it will increase by its liberal diffusion.

Courteous manners not only convey happiness in large measure to the recipients but also to their possessor.

Every one who does a gracious action feels its reward immediately in a conscious satisfaction that can never follow a gruff, haughty or repellant mood. Children trained to be poilte and gentle are always happier than it suffered to disregard the feelings of their companions. The piessure that follows the exercise of power, so often thought to be confined to the rich, is in truth possessed by every one of us. It is also eminently expansive in its nature, Justice and generosity can at most be exercised only on a limited coale; even patrioliam concerns a single nation, but the virtue of civility knows no exceptions. Every one we meet, from the dearest friend to the utter stranger, may claim some tribute at our bands. Good-will may be shown in counties ways, and carries with it a cheerfulness and animation that more than compensates for the effort it may cost.

and animation that more than compensates for the effort it may cost.

Nothing is more efficient in securing the esteem and affection that all desire, than kind, courieous, and conciliatory manners. To these, all are ready to do homage, while many will shrink from an obligation, and only feel drawn away from those who haughtly proffer material aid. It is the respect and consideration conveyed in these little attentions, trifling as they may in themselves appear, that win the hearts and secure the good will of those to whom we show them. Let no one then despise a courteous bearing, or neglect the lesser amenties of life. They will render the disposition lise! more lovely, for every emotion is strengthened by natural expression, and weakened by repression. They will confer untold happiness on all upon whom they are showered, and return a rich blessing on him who scatters them. While ever shunning the false coin of a cold efficients in the strength the return a rich the sever shunning the false coin of a cold etiquette, that aprings from no gentle emotion, it is scherich the return a rich the sever shunning the false coin of a cold etiquette, that aprings from no gentle ettiquette, that springs from no gentle emotion, let us cherish the natural ex-pression of a kind spirit, and thus lighten the burdens of the sorrowful, and add to the cup of joy that all may laste.

A Woman writes to the Nation in favor of women becoming preachers of pretty faces for companions. the Gospel. She enforces her proposition by an argument so original that we can hardly believe it was not suggested by some witty man. Referring of the church than men, and in conse-quence have more influence with the opposite sex than with her own. Hence, she concludes, if women did the preach-ing, they would be equally successful in converting men as men are in converting women, and therefore they ought to be employed.

Boston felt peculiarly interested in the international boat-race, and adopt ed a curious method of announcing th matter. If the Harvards were victorious, 5-5 was to be struck by the fir ous, 5-5 was to be struck by the fire latern; but as they were defeated, 2-2 was struck. If the Harvards won, the American flag was to be displayed on the top of a pole on Telegraph Hill at Hull; but as the English boat best, the flag was run up only half-way of the staff. The Harvard boys assembled in Boston to learn the result, and when it dame they fild not obser.

The advocates of the system of eight The advocates of the system of eight hours labor seem to imsgine that it will contribute of necessity to the intellectual and social improvement of the laborer. The hours gained from hard toll, it is added, will be put to higher uses. It is possible that this may be the result in our country, to a considerable extent, for all mulating influences abound here to a higher degree than in any other country on earth. But it is against the general law of human nature, and sgainst the teachings of
